Human Rights are not just part of a lofty United Nations document but a set of practical ideas that should be taught in our schools. As secular standards to guide our behaviour, a knowledge of Human Rights is one of the major ingredients of social cohesion and democracy in a diverse society like Australia. Knowledge of these rights can both improve relations between people of different ethnicity and belief, and nourish civil society.

Join us at the 9th International Conference on Human Rights Education as we share and discuss our experience of Human Rights Education with representatives from Australia and others from over 50 countries. How important is Human Rights Education (HRE) in the preservation of World Peace and in countries like Australia where there is no Bill of Rights? How vital is Human Rights Education in developing countries or in times of crisis? And how do local conditions both here and abroad shape the sharing of these universal values and protect the vulnerable?

The Universal Declaration of Human Rights, proclaimed by the United Nations General Assembly in Paris on the 10th of December 1948, and since translated into 500 languages, set out the fundamental human rights as a common standard. Since this time it has been globally accepted that these universal rights are the way forward, albeit that the human rights movement continues to be one largely without organisation or budget.

The Vienna Declaration and Programme of Action of 1993 called for sustained effort and international cooperation for the protection of these rights. Therefore, the 9th ICHRE will not only be a celebration of these important events, but an important gathering to share and workshop both the difficulties faced, and the advances made in Human Rights Education since the Universal Declaration of Human Rights 70 years ago.

Please join us between 26-29 November 2018
